Exempt from firearms licensing law auxiliary police or peace officers appointed by defense councils for the duration of the war. (Senator Feinberg, Plattsburg.)

County Officers Ask Repeal Of Pay Differential Law

Albany—(AP)—New York's County Officers Association called last night for repeal of a statute granting pay differentials to state employes in the armed forces as members of the organized reserve and National Guard.

The association urged the Legislature to defeat a proposal to pay the difference between Army and Civilian salaries to all governmental employes drafted or who volunteer for military service. The measure is sponsored by Senator Wicks, Kingston.

"Such a plan," Broome County Attorney Chamberlain told the association's annual meeting, "is a step toward dictatorship and would tear down military morale."

The association, in another resolution, asked the Legislature to relieve local governmental units of responsibility for the welfare of volunteer defense workers.

Harry L. Hedger, Nassau County treasurer, was elected president to succeed Truman L. Preston, Onondaga County attorney, who had served seven terms.

Other officers named were: Beecher S. Clother, Glens Falls; Denzil G. Perkins, Belmont, William M. Gallagher, Oswego, and Chamberlain, vicepresidents; Mrs. Mabel B. Preisch, Lockport, treasurer, and John L. Fiester, Elmira, secretary.

New York Cotton

New York—(AP)—Cotton futures moved up to moderate gains yesterday on trade buying. New Orleans and replacement purchases. The advance was induced by subsidence of the recent heavy liquidating movement and reports that holders of cotton in the South remained adamant despite the sharp setback during the past 10 days.

Heavy mill selling and scale up hedging were absorbed on the advance.

Late prices were 45 to 90 cents a bale higher; Mar 18.31; July 18.60, and Dec 18.72.

Futures closed 65 to 80 cents a bale higher.

And the Walls Came Tumbling

By Joseph McCord

CHAPTER 20

While Andre ate his delayed supper, Amos lingered in his chair, smoking a cigar, and Carol sat with her chin resting on the palms of her hands, watching and listening. Even though Mrs. Steel asked her brother rather directly where he had been, he proved evasive, hinting that he was following up a new business deal. It might be something; it might not. However, Aunt Cassie seemed to be in a forgiving state of mind, and retold her story of the new woman and the Hutchins house. Andre was duly intrigued by Elsie Smith's description of the newcomer.

"She doesn't sound quite like anybody in Jericho," he said as he stirred his second cup of coffee. "It looks to me, Cassandra, as if you might be in for some competition. I'll swear it's a new boarding house."

"Humph."

"I think, Amos," he continued, "you and I might drive out there of an evening and ask for rates. God forbid that we'd be interested, but it would serve as an excuse to meet the lady."

"You'd better make sure that's what she is . . . first," was Cassie's pointed answer. "If you've finished I'll take your dishes so's Elsie can get through."

When Andre went into the hall for his suitcase, Carol followed him.

"Can I talk to you for a few minutes?" she asked in a low voice.

"Sure. Come on up while I unpack."

Once in his room, he regarded Carol with his familiar twisted smile. But there was a worried look in his blue eyes. He thrust the suitcase in a corner and closed the door, then sat on the bed and motioned toward his one rocker.

"Sit down, ducklet. Is it secrets?"

"Yes."

"I wish I had my zither then."

"Why, Andy?"

"Because I've been talking to Chet. That's why I was late, mainly.

"Oh. Then you know . . . He told you."

"Like the gentleman that he is, yes. He didn't ask my blessing or anything of the sort, but he wanted me to know. So he said. He seemed very much concerned over the idea that he must have made himself look like an idiot in your eyes. But he stuck to his major premise . . . or whatever they call it."

"You mean . . .?"

"I mean that he seems to be very deeply in love. Didn't he give you some such an impression?"

"He tried to." Carol's lower lip quivered.

"And you didn't believe his story?"

"I couldn't, Andy. Of course I couldn't! Could I?"

"You women. I'm not holding any brief for Chet. But I can assure you that such things are possible with a man. I married your mother two weeks from the day I first saw her. You are very like her. I suppose I can understand the boy's feelings. But yours are something else again. And your secrets wouldn't include that."

"But I scarcely know him, Andy! I almost disliked him the first time I talked with him, but . . ."

"But you think you might like him well enough as a friend. Well, why not. If he's made of the right stuff, his ardor will cool none too quickly. I fancy he will make some woman happy in his day. He has a great deal to offer . . . in some ways at least. You may not be the woman. Let your heart decide that. I believe you have not seen him since?"

Carol shook her head despondently. It seemed to her that she could not look him in the face again, but Andy didn't know why.

"I gathered as much," her parent replied. "Chet's uneasy, but you've not finished with him, my dear. Unless you order him out when he shows up. And we can't very well forbid him Cassandra's house. I told him he'd better ask for me when he came next time. That will give you sort of a free hand. Will that help?"

"Maybe." Carol managed a mirthless smile. "I was going to ask your advice about it," she reminded. "About everything."

"God save us, ducklet! Didn't you hear what I've been saying? It's as near to advice as anything I can ever give you. If you decide you don't want any of the young men cluttering up the horizon, there's one old one who will be perfectly content to have his girl with him as long as she'll stay. I'm probably out of bounds, but may I set myself straight on one count?"

Carol nodded. She could not trust herself to speak for the moment.

"It's about Wige," Andy explained hesitatingly. "I haven't talked to him about anything. But I gather that he has eased himself out of the picture. Mind telling me? I can understand that, too."

There was no reply. Andy sighed. "I think," he said, "that perhaps you'd better come over here."

Carol was beside him instantly, her head buried on his shoulder, his arms holding her close.

"Sort of figured you needed a clearing-up spell," he said gently. "Take your time," he added as he felt her slim shoulders shake with vainly suppressed sobs.

After a short interval, Carol raised her tear-streaked face and smiled.

"Excuse me for sniffling." She dabbed at her eyes. "I was not crying about anybody . . . just so mixed-up . . . tired of thinking I feel better now."

"Sure I know."

"I'd like to run away from everything and everybody . . . but just for a little while."

"Not a bad idea," Andy mused. "This slight break I had sort of cleared the atmosphere for me. Why don't you take a little trip?"

"Will you go with me?"

"Love to. A little later, maybe. I've got some matters on hand that may take some time. But I believe a change would do you good. You can go wherever you want."

"I don't know. . . . There's another thing I wanted to talk about, Andy. I've about decided to leave the office."

"And why?"

"Because I don't need the money. Some girl without a job should have mine."

"Hm. And she probably told you so. There's something in the idea. Perhaps you should. That will be a little change in itself. I've been thinking the same thing about my shop. My friend Nick the Greek has a fellow countryman who dreams of running a pants-pressing emporium and I'm tempted to encourage him. My fixtures aren't worth much . . . merely a matter of putting a figure on the Delaine good-will," he added whimsically. "I'll probably kick myself when I see him making a young fortune. Those Hellenes have ways as well as words."

"Well, I know one thing." Carol sat erect, a look of determination in her brown eyes. "It's time I was getting out of my rut and this general daze . . . time to be doing something on my own. And worth while."

"Such as?" Andy bit the end from a cigar and regarded his daughter curiously.

"I don't know. But something."

"Good. I can understand. . . There's something funny, too. Do you notice how I'm forever saying that I can understand this person and that person? I've sprung it two or three times since we've been talking. But you never hear me say I understand myself. Worse still, I never have. That's something to think of. Next to you, I've missed my zither most of all these past few days. I'll wager it's dusty."

Carol's new resolution to accomplish something was still in her mind when she woke the next morning. She went to work in her car. As soon as Dr. Silverthorne appeared, she announced that she had decided to give up her position with him. She believed it was the thing to do, but she would remain until he arranged for her successor.

"Whatever you think, Carol," was his brief response. "I'll look around a bit. Been fairly busy of late. I think I may have to have someone."

"And would you mind if I took an hour or so off this morning?"

"No." He started curiously. "Don't tell me you are going out to look for another job . . . on my time."

"Not exactly," she smiled. "Not here in Jericho at least."

Head erect and looking neither to the right or left, Carol drove to the Lennon home. There was no chance whatever that Wige could be there and this errand did not concern him, now. When she reached the house she parked outside the fence rather than follow the driveway that led to the rear. She smiled a little to herself as she got out, aware that neighbors' tongues would wag excitedly. Fortunately, she had not driven her car a great deal and many passers-by would not associate it with her. She walked quickly to the front door and rang the bell.

After a while steps sounded in the hall. Amanda Lennon opened the door cautiously, then threw it wide.

"Good gracious, Carol Delaine! Since when do you have to come to a body's front door?"

"I had a reason," the caller smiled. "How are you? May I come in?"

"Well, I should think as much! You're a sight for sore eyes, dear!" Amanda wiped her hands on her apron and extended her right. "But you did give me a start! Come out into the sitting-room where it's warm."

"Just a minute." Carol hesitated. "It was such a nice morning I thought Charlie would be in his shop and I wanted to speak to you alone, if I may."

"He is. The poor boy won't come in until I make him have his dinner. He won't want to even then. So we can talk all you like. Take this chair, dear." She was dusting it with the corner of her apron as she spoke. "How nice you look! It seems so good to see you again."

Carol sat looking into her hostess' faded but eager eyes, not quite sure how best to introduce the topic of her visit. As long as she had known Amanda Lennon she suddenly realized that she didn't know the little woman at all. She habitually wore a worried air, rather helpless—or was it hopeless? Yet she could speak her mind determinedly enough when there was occasion. She must have worked very hard, Carol thought. But she could not recall any show of emotion of affection by Mrs. Lennon. Not even toward Charlie, although she never was short in her speech with him as she often was with Wige.

Amanda, however, began the interview with an abrupt question. One that left Carol very nearly speechless with confusion.

"Did you come to talk with me about Wilbur?"

"Why, no— . . . Oh, no!"

"I hoped you had maybe. He's eating his heart out, Carol, for you."
